Barking Up The Right Tree!

Pavlov's Drive-Thru

by Dorcas Cartle - April 17, 2000

Since moving to Oregon from Southern California last year, we, and our dogs, have had to adjust to many new things in our lives. For our dogs (Stormy, Windy, and Breezy) one of the hardest adjustments is related to an Oregon law regarding gasoline safety. Apparently the dangers of inhaling gasoline fumes were identified years ago in this state, so it has been mandated that consumers cannot pump their own gas. That's right, there's no such thing as Self-Serve Gas Stations in Oregon.

Native Oregonians can tell relocated Californians fairly easily. Aside from our cars, we are the ones that pull into a gas station and leap out of the car, looking foolish while we wait for the attendant to fill the tank, flexing our hands as they yearn for the feel of the pump. One can tell relocated California dogs as easily by the fact that they are convinced the gas station attendant must be a car-jacker, so they go crazy barking at him.

Stormy, in particular, feels it is his duty to protect the car. He likes nothing better than eliciting a reaction from a poor attendant who sees an eighty pound Belgian Sheepdog growling and barking and acting like he knows where his next meal is coming from. Stormy is a ferocious defender of the car at gas stations.

It is surprising, then, that Stormy would be willing to give the car away to another stranger who approaches the car. That stranger is the attendant at a fast food restaurant. Stormy is a doll when we buy burgers from the drive-thru. At the gas station he "grrrs" while at McDonalds he purrs.

Arguably one of the first blogs, "Barking Up The Right Tree!" is both a collection of funny stories and an exploration into the use of the Internet for print publishing. Delivered via Hewlett Packard's innovative (and short-lived) HP Instant Delivery service at the turn of the millenium, these tales of city dwellers relocated to the Oregon forest generate smiles and laughter through both text and imagery.
