At the time of my writing this book, I am a seventeen-year old kid who was born and raised in the poverty stricken, urban cities of Irvington and the infamous Newark, New Jersey A.K.A Brick City. These are two cities where being a young black male increases your odds of a prison life or a life cut short, far out weighing the chances of a happy life. I was named Quamir Shaquan Hodges. With my family going through the struggles that we faced, I did what a vast majority of urban American black males do. I turned to the streets. I did so in search of family, friends and a better way of life. Let me be the first to tell you that while you may believe the streets will provide what you want and may even give the impression of family and success; it only does the complete opposite.

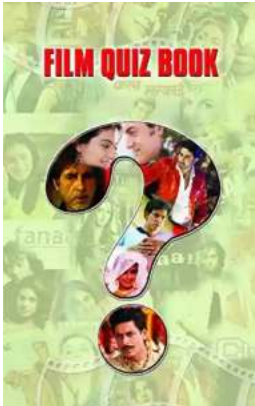

Being incarcerated granted me the ability to be able to set my priorities straight and focus on turning my life around. I am now attempting to deter myself from returning to my prior lifestyle by reflecting back on the mistakes that have led me to my current imprisonment. Prison in no sense of the word is good; but if I can take advantage of this time and the opportunities available to me, I can attempt to do everything in my power to turn my life around and start over.

I started paying for my life at fourteen. I thought that once I got locked up and sentenced to prison that my dreams were over and I wouldn't be able to achieve them. I used to think that prison was in the way and would ruin me, but I quickly made the decision to not be beaten down by the system. I would have new dreams and a new life and prison was going to be my new birth.
